The origins of the flute can be traced back to ancient civilizations, with evidence of flute-like instruments discovered in archaeological sites dating back to prehistoric times. During the Middle Ages, the flute evolved into a more sophisticated instrument, with the addition of finger holes and a more refined design. By the Renaissance period, the flute had become a popular and versatile instrument, used in both secular and sacred music.

The Renaissance flute, also known as the recorder, is a woodwind instrument with a distinctive cylindrical bore and a fipple mouthpiece. It typically has seven finger holes and one thumb hole, and its range varies depending on the size of the instrument. The most common types of Renaissance flutes include the soprano, alto, tenor, and bass recorders. Each flute has its own unique tonal qualities, from the bright and airy sound of the soprano to the deep and resonant tones of the bass.
